Discussing his recommendations to the president, Mr. Meyer in his report, declared the livestock industry had never been financed properly because the turnover of three years involved in breeding cattle could not be taken care of with six months loans and because of the need for radical revision in the methods of supervision and inspection of livestock loans. New livestock loan companies, he said, might constitute the nucleus upon which rediscounting organizations could be developed.

The processes of financing should adjust themselves to the "natural processes of production and distribution rather than vice versa," he said. "We have reached the point where the right of co-operative marketing organizations to carry the products of their members for orderly marketing until the consumer is ready to take them, must be recognized, and the necessary financing machinery provided."
